- In addition to the convenience of the format, drinking lemon juice in the morning can provide different health benefits to the organism, if consumed on an empty stomach.

The European Union is increasingly known as the land of lemons. It produces some of the highest quality lemons in the world. In addition, European lemon is one of the star foods that make up the popular Mediterranean diet, one of the healthiest according to the World Health Organization (WHO), a situation that is reflected in the countless dishes in which it is present, as it is used to dress salads; accompany seafood, fish or meat, and season desserts.

This versatility also allows for its juice to be used as a natural juice, a feature that can be adopted and contribute to a good habit if ingested on an empty stomach, since it has a number of benefits that affect directly on the good health of the regular consumer. The vitamin C in lemon contributes to the normal functioning of the immune system and to the protection of cells against oxidative damage. This way, it is possible to start the day with an advantage of support to our organism, especially during the winter, when it is more sensitive to respiratory diseases.

Similarly, this nutrient - lemon has about 50 mg of vitamin C per 100 g of edible part - helps to reduce both fatigue and body tiredness, apart from optimizing iron absorption. In fact, this mineral is very necessary for the growth and development of the body, according to the Spanish Agency for Food Safety and Nutrition (AESAN), and collaborates in the normal energy metabolism, in charge of managing fuels to cover the daily needs of the human organism.

Like other fruits, it contains a significant amount of soluble fibers (gums, mucilage and pectins) and insoluble fibers (cellulose, hemicellulose and lignin). The former absorbs a substantial amount of water, which generates a greater feeling of satiety, while the latter helps regulate intestinal transit.
